What does it take to build a basic Web application? How do you make it secure? How do you leverage the various languages and frameworks? How do you design a secure Web application? These questions and many others are answered in this course, Web Application Security Essentials, designed by Dave Shackleford, coauthor of Network Hacks and Web Application Security. In Web Application Security Essentials, you will learn how to build secure and robust Web applications using a variety of different frameworks and languages. You will learn how to develop and deploy applications that will defend against most common types of attacks such as SQL injection, cross-site scripting, session fixation, cross-site request forgery, and impersonation. This course also covers general principles of application security such as security from the standpoint of the browser, general best practices, security from the view of the developer, web application frameworks and languages, and security from the view of the network. Detection of the human T-cell lymphotropic virus type 1 (HTLV-1) in patients with cervical cancer is crucial for the appropriate management of this disease. In this study, a real-time quantitative polymerase chain reaction (RT-qPCR) was developed for the detection of HTLV-1-DNA in human papillomavirus (HPV)-associated cervical cancer cell lines and biopsies. The first step, which is essential for the detection of HPV-DNA, was based on the use of the SYBR Green I technology, the detection of the
